THE LOST YEARS

Turtles have been thriving in the world's seas for over 200 million years, enjoying the warm waters of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Indian oceans utilising these areas as feeding and mating grounds. 7 species of this enchanting aquatic reptile exist today, capturing people's hearts with their docile behaviour and elegance in the water. The largest is the leatherback growing up to 7 feet long and weighing as much as a tonne (a remarkable feat given they feed almost exclusively on jellyfish).

For millions of years, sea turtles have been returning to their natal beaches to breed and lay their eggs. Green turtles can lay as many as 120 eggs at a time and have been observed producing up to 6 clutches in a single season, equating to nearly 1000 eggs. After around 8 weeks of incubation, the nest will erupt with tiny turtle hatchlings, each one scrambling over the sandy beach to reach the ocean. If they're lucky enough to avoid the hungry mouths of gulls and the snapping pincers of crabs, they then must then evade the gaping jaws of predatory fish such as jacks and scombrids before finding their way to the deep ocean where predators are fewer and further between. Once out there these tiny dinosaurs will associate themselves with floating weed mats or other debris as sanctuary and surrender themselves to the ocean's currents during a period of their life known as 'the lost years'.

They'll spend the best part of a decade at the mercy of the sea before moving on to find coastal feeding grounds as an adolescent turtle. A further decade later and they're ready to breed, undertaking huge migrations back to their natal beaches to mate and lay their eggs. Only 1 in every thousand hatchlings will survive to adulthood and have the opportunity to produce offspring of their own.
